

The FCC is so "thrilled" in introducing another technology in to the High Speed Broadband arena. The problem is the FCC is in disarray with the current technology (dsl/cable). I read an article that said Broadband over Power Lines would replace competition lost by the linesharing ruling. Then what? Who would want to invest in this technology when your track record of changing rules is abominable at best (TA of '96)?

You have competition in place now and you want remove it! I say you concentrate on the technologies you have and ensure you have competition and focus on the consumer instead of pumping and potentially wasting money in an unproven technology.

Work with what you got!
